People Are Spending Less Time Wasting Time - pmiller2 ===== pmiller2 >The study involved more than 1,000 users, but none had their smartphones monitored during the course of the study. _sigh_ The people that don't want to know don't show up in studies like this, because if they did, the results would be much less positive, at least for the users who don't want to "mess with their phones." ~~~ dang I looked into this yesterday. The study shows that the subset of users who proactively modified their time use did report a greater decline in daily hours spent on social media. However, I think the _number_ of hours (and/or/days) they spend on social media is probably an artefact of their having finished the survey at different times, and of their mobile devices being underpowered for the task. This is because the survey is interrupted by automated prompts asking people if they want to read the next question. Some people might have given up on the survey early. And because people's devices probably weren't too powerful, people who spent a lot of time on social media, or didn't, probably didn't spend it on their phones. So I don't think the numbers tell us much. They may give us a rough idea of the kind of volunteers who might have over-reported on their days spent on social media, but that's just a guess. I'm not trying to be dismissive. That's a very interesting question, and
